OBSERVATIONS ON STYLE. (See titpra, pp. 45, 118. ) The use of writitig, as of speaking, is to express our thoughts with certainty and perspicuity. But as writing is a permanent thing, it is requisite that written forms of speech have a greater degree of precision and perspicuity than is necessary in colloquial forms, or such as very well answer the purpose of common conversation. Style, therefore, which is the manner of writing, may be deemed perfect, when it adequately expresses the whole of what is intended; and every other fault or imperfection in a composition ought to be charged to the account of the thought or conception. But, since every defect in the meaning is indicated by the style, all critics, in their observations on style, generally comprehend under this term, what, strictly speaking, belongs to the other: and, as I approve of their reason, I shall, after their example, use the word in the same latitude. The correspondence between every persons thoughts and language is perhaps more strict, and universal, than is generally imagined: for since there can be but few perceptions or ideas existing in the human mind, which were not, in their very rise and first impression, associated with the words that denote them; it is almost impossible, but that ideas and the symbols, or expressions of them, must arise in the mind at the same time; and if any person will but attend to his own...
