BY PROF. P. P. CIAXTON, UNIVERSITY OF TENNESSEE. Professor Claxton spoke extempore, and said in substance: The high school question is now one of the most important educational topics in the South. There is but one public high school with a separate building for that purpose in North Carolina. There are probably twelve or twenty with instruction through the tenth grade, but these can not be said to be high schools. In Mississippi, with only a comparatively few white people and a large negro population, they have done much better than the other Southern States, for they have some fifty-five or sixty public high schools. The day has come when all children should have the opportunity to get a high school education. Just as our grandfathers needed to learn the rudiments of an elementary education, our children to-day, in order...
